

Kashef Chowdhury is a “land architect,” according to Louis Kahn’s surprising and little known coinage of this term, a métier that invariably involves the strategy of “stacking.” In this the earthwork has priority, and the resulting architecture has a markedly topographic character, as is evident from the work of this rising master architect working in a landscape where overnight the entire country may become a flood plain.

Kenneth Frampton